

Knowledge about value

“I need to say that the value of science to patients is immense – indeed, I myself would be dead at least three times over without modern medicine and surgery,” said Iona Heath, speaker at FederaDag, 11th November. But it could still be better, she continued. “The value would be even greater if biomedical science was more circumspect: more prepared to concede its pretension to knowledge that does not stand up to scrutiny, its exclusion of other important sources of knowledge, and its corruption by conflicts of interest and by wishful thinking.”

Growing your value network

The FederaDag was an excellent opportunity to network for the more than 60 participants. Experts were present out of many biomedical fields and many fields of work. John Jacobs: “Spoken with other postdocs, and heard about the many nonacademic career possibilities for the 99,5% very valuable postdocs.”

In 2017, you will again be offered a possibility to grow your knowledge and network. The subject is:

‘Experiments on humans and animals’

Experiments on human or animals are delicate and important. Yet a lot of research remains wasted or not performed, which both would be a loss for the experimental subjects and objects. The FederaDag 2017 zooms in on these crucial in vivo experiments.

The Federa Award 2016: a radical change in strategy for anticancer research

Award winner prof David Stewart shared 7 Messages on how to make cancer research more clinical relevant. Which messages? See How to make Cancer Research more clinical relevant.

Societal Federa Award: towards greater participation by patients in science

“A PSP is like a flash mob”, says Steph Garfield-Birbeck, JLA manager, who was handed over the societal Federa Award. But the JLA does not initiate this flash mobs. Who does initiate, and how they proceed, see "Towards greater participation by patients in science".
